This research represents a new frontier in computer power consumption, and not the first to demonstrate Moore's law's superiority over the industry to date. A team from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the University of Maryland analyzed the energy requirements for many of the most powerful computers ever built. These computers run on a form of semiconductor called gallium arsenide, which is 10 times as efficient at the same power consumption as silicon chips today. Their findings, announced in 2010 and then validated by scientists at ARM last year, showed that a single gallium arsenide system could consume only 30 watts when under heavy load.. The paper, "The Moore's Law Effect in Solid State Circuits," was published this past winter in the journal Applied Physics Letters. The authors include Kavitha L. Jayasimha of MIT and colleagues from several other institutions. It shows how power consumption could become drastically reduced during the transition to computer-based computers, where computers and data centers often go together (albeit using different storage units).. This paper shows that a one-millimeter system can consume only 11 watts while requiring 20 to 30 watts of power for each 20 to 40 LEDs mounted on it. In addition, the paper indicates that a single square inch of silicon could hold two 1.45-watt systems, enough to power about one computer. This is a significant speedup over standard PC graphics cards with the same power draw at about 1 watt, although
